

Examples of Situations That Would Require an Emergency Permit

1. A military base finds outdated and unusable munition items in storage. The items cannot be safely transported offsite to a permitted treatment or disposal facility and the military base does not have a permit to detonate the munitions on site.
2. Expired and unstable chemicals are discovered in a laboratory and must be treated in order to make them safe for transport offsite.
3. A contractor picks up a hazardous waste from an emergency response incident. The contractor then finds that there is no readily-available facility with the capacity to receive the waste, so the contractor must store the waste until an authorized facility can be found. The contractor does not have a permit for storing the hazardous waste.
